

Does Montessori Prepare Children for the Real World?

With Tim Seldin

A Parent, Caregiver, Teacher Night

Parents and educators not familiar with Dr. Montessori's research and the program that it inspired are often skeptical about whether or not Montessori graduates will have been adequately prepared to succeed in the real world. As Dr. John Stoops, Director of the Middle States Associations for the Accreditation of Colleges writes:

Maria Montessori's research and program have withstood the test of time, and I predict that within the next two decades the world of education will fully discover its debt to her. She was no will-of-the-wisp. She was an imaginative and rigorous student of child development who produced a vast number of original ideas and had both the enterprise and pragmatic courage to put them to work. Her gift to education is a much deeper appreciation and understanding of the child and the human potential.

Tim, who attended the Barrie School in Silver Spring, Maryland from age 2 through 12th grade, will share his own memories and experiences, along with the accumulated experience and insights of scores of Montessori teachers, parents, and children around the world.
